Government Appointments.

UNDER the civil service rules, there were made last in the Treasury Department at Washington, last year, 135 appointments, of whom 106 were men and 29 were women. Most of the appointees were assigned to lower grades—the $900 and $1000 class. The operation of the rules is said to be "satisfactory to all concerned." But it would be a violent presumption to assume that the cuts are satisfied. One good feature of this system is its provision for distributing the appointments under it among the States, according to the fixed quota of each, as nearly as may be. Formerly there was gross inequality in this respect, which has not yet been corrected. In all the Government departments at Washington, there are officials or employees who have been there for a period of time beyond which the number of men cannot reach the contrary, unless the man whose services are a modern Methuselah. These men are stayed by faith and occupation. Changes of administration they are oblivious to, as far as such changes affect the positions upon which they keep a grip which only death can shake. In fact, it would be a mighty sudden and agile administration that could change as quickly as these ancient and fossiliferous barnacles can change—and they know it. Many of these men came originally from States in which they have long since lost their residences, and are now credited to the District of Columbia, which in that way has come to have an enormously disproportionate representation in every department of the National Capital. If any serious attempt is made to equalize the distribution of appointments, the greater number of these "old fellas" will have to be credited back to the States from which they originally hailed, or the District of Columbia will have to be permitted to continue its present disproportion of appointees, or somebody will have to be given the "grand bounces" for the sake of correcting the present inequalities.

It is a troublesome question for the appointing power.

The sudden death of Schuyler Colfax, which is announced by telegraph, will shock the country. He was for nearly a quarter of a century a conspicuous figure in the public life of the country, coming into national politics with the Republican party, and continuing on the topmost wave of success until his unfortunate fauz pass in the Credit Mobilier business, when the reflux tide carried him back into private life, where he has remained ever since, up to the day of his death. He served several terms in Congress, was Speaker of the House, and in 1868 was elected Vice-President on the ticket with General Grant. In early life he worked as a printer and journalist, and since retiring from Congress has employed himself pleasantly and profitably as a lecturer.

All of the public men who stumbled and fell into that devilish trap, the Credit Mobilier, Schuyler Colfax's fall was perhaps the hardest. The writer remembers him as he stood, confused and humiliated, before the Congressional inquisition, and flinched under the fire of questions put to him touching his dealings in those lackluster shares, the fatal record of which was kept by Oaks Ames in that terrible memorandum-book which he held in his recitations grasp as he sat at the table around which the Congressional court was assembled. Colfax's defense seemed to be peculiarly unfortunate, though his case was not a whit worse than the cases of several of his co-spectators. He was so summarily driven into political exile by the result of the trial, and never emerged therefrom.

It is notable and significant, however, that during all his trials his own neighbors and constituents, who knew him best, never deserted him or lost faith in his innate integrity.

In the last campaign in his district he was strongly urged to stand for re-election to Congress. But he firmly declined, preferring, as he said, the employments and enjoyments of private life. It must have been a great consolation in his closing days, after having suffered so much obloquy from his countrymen, to feel the soothing consciousness that those who had known him longest and best believed he was not intentionally a corrupt man. Certainly his long life had upon it only that great stain.

We reprint, with our indorsement, the following from the Washington Star:

One of the most remarkable events that has occurred for a long time has been the action of the national commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, expressing disapprobation of the school to get up a $100,000 dollar a month for every Union veteran. The soldiers of the war have a duty to perform towards it in peace, also, and the action should be taken to meet this requirement. The public sentiment among the war veterans themselves, opposed to all schemes to raise the Treasury in their name, should be depended on, as the security against damage from this source.

The feeling among Union soldiers as a whole, as well as among right-thinking civilians, who wish to see justice done in the matter of pensions, is, as we interpret that feeling, that while the Government cannot do too much for the worthy disabled soldiers, or for the needy widows and orphans of those who died in defense of the country, it is neither just nor patriotic, at this late day, to call upon the Government to pay pensions to sound men.

The recent collapse of several theatrical troupes and operatic organizations furnishes a hint to managers that possibly it might be a good scheme for them to reduce prices, which are in a good many cases above the value of the entertainments furnished.
